

There are several stakeholders I could consider for my project. First, iPad users might be obsessed with their technology and want to see everyone else use it. I could try and convince them that education is different, and they shouldn't be so eager. Second, I could talk to parents of students because they might be thinking of getting their kids iPads for Christmas. I would want to tell them not to. But really, I think I'll talk to principals. The reason for this is that want to prevent schools from adopting the technology, and individual teachers might not have a say in the matter.

This relates to my research because I have found that iPads in education don't help very much, and I still see lots of articles about teachers who are excited to use them in class and schools that are excited to adopt them everywhere. That new iBooks textbooks program is also pretty scary. I want to convince people that engagement isn't the goal of a classroom.
